

“Metamorphosis”

As the apples rained down
Falling to my left and right
I tried my very hardest
Though I could not make a flight

For my energy was gone
Dwindled by the chase
My father following closely
Not a second behind my pace

I stared at him with bulging eyes
Pleading for his pity
But I am not the man that he once knew
And for that I do feel guilty

The final apple struck me hard
The center of my back embedded
Not only with a simple fruit
But the reminder that my very being is dreaded
